The color ORANGE is named after the fruit of that color, introduced to the court of King Henry VIII via the Sanskrit word naranja. Before this the color was referred to in Old English as geoluhread, translatable into Modern English as yellow-red.

As a warm color orange is a stimulant, heightening emotions and even the appetite; it denotes energy, power and the benign warmth of the sun. Orange represents Hinduism in the flag of Sri Lanka, and the saffron stripe in the Indian flag signifies courage, sacrifice, and the spirit of renunciation.

Historically, it is associated with the royal family of The Netherlands and Protestant Ireland. According to psychics an orange aura is associated with intellectual ambition or stubbornness. Curiosity is a driving characteristic of orange, and people who like orange are usually thoughtful and sincere.

Psychologically, orange can be beneficial to the digestive system and can strengthen the immune system; it is said to relieve feelings of self-pity, lack of self-worth, and is an antidepressant. Due to its brightness, orange is used on road signs, safety jackets and the like to warn of pending dangers.
